

Budget groups begins allocations

Administrative cost assessment of 3 percent discussed

TAYLOR MULLER
NEWS EDITOR

The second meeting of the organization responsible for allocating nearly half a million dollars of student fees was marked by discussion of preliminary numbers for student government and its agencies.

The Student Activities Budget Commission met to consider student government's operational budget and the programming budgets of its four agencies – American Multicultural Student Agency, International Student Services, Network for disAbled Students, Women's Resource Center as well as Gender and Sexual Orientation Student Agency. An overview of AMS's operational budget, but not a vote on its initial allocation, also took place during Monday's meeting.

SABC is charged with budgeting the Fund A portion of the University Programs and Facilities Fee. Fund A money goes to support student government and its agencies, Student Programming Organization and about 30 percent of the Gateway. Last year, SABC allocated $253,171; this year the requests total about $447,000.

During the meeting, the Senate's operational budget was approved, and $182,785 was allocated, with 3 percent taken out for administrative costs. Agency Programming was also approved, allocating $35,750, before the 3 percent deduction.

AMS was asked to prepare more details on specific line items, including its remodeling. Those details will be presented during the final allocation meeting, which is scheduled for March 3.

One of the reasons for the noted increase is the funding of the Maverick Connection program, a newspaper partnership that brings copies of The New York Times, USA Today and Omaha World-Herald to campus at a charge of about $5 per student per semester.

Appointments to this year's commission were finalized Monday, with Student Government Vice President Buey Ruet's picks for students-at-large being made during last Thursday's emergency Student Senate session. Ruet appointed, with the senate's confirmation, Nick Almazan, Kimberly Coleman and Michael Smith.

Smith, who was absent from Monday's meeting, resigned as a senator in April 2006 after articles of impeachment were drafted against him for missing too many meetings. He also resigned in Sept. 2006 as recording secretary, because he was unable to attend executive council meetings.

Smith said he was absent Monday because he had not been notified of the meeting times.

"I don't know a lot about SABC, but I do feel that students need to have a voice where their fees are being allocated," Smith said.

David Ogden, an associate professor of communication, was also appointed to the commission as the second faculty member.

During the meeting, Director of Student Organizations and Leadership Programs Barb Treadway explained that 3 percent of all Fund A allocations were already allocated for administrative costs, waivers and other expenses.

Kathy Pfeiffer, UNO's budget coordinator, said that the deduction had been calculated in previous years but was forgotten last year, creating a budget shortfall. To avoid that problem this year, the university decided to make SABC aware of the deduction and require the commission to account for it while allocating funds.

"There always has been an administrator fee for services, for administering Fund A," Pfeiffer said. "It goes to support the bookkeeping and those functions of Fund A; it goes to the university's role in Fund A."

The 3 percent deduction goes towards "things like utilities, accounting, billing and regarding

Blood drive for custard

Students who gave a pint of blood on Wednesday got a pint back – of custard that is.

The Omaha American Red Cross, in conjunction with the UNO Honors Program, sponsored a blood drive in the Milo Bail Student Center.

"The drive held at UNO today was a great success despite the bad weather students still showed up to support their community and donate blood," said Danelle Schlegelmilch, the communications and public relations specialist of the Midwest region for the American Red Cross.

"The blood drive went really well. We had a goal of 57 units, and we got 62. We appreciated all the support," said Alicia Krogstrand, the Honors Program treasurer and blood drive coordinator.

According to a press release, to encourage students to donate, the American Red Cross and the restaurant, Culver's, united to offer each presenting blood donor a free t-shirt and a coupon for a pint of Culver's custard.

The program, called the "Give a Pint, Get a Pint" campaign, is part of a state-wide promotion.

"This promotion we are doing with Culver's in the month of February is with five different colleges in the state of Nebraska. So, it was really cool that UNO was able to participate. The local owner of the Culver's in Omaha donated all the pints of custard, so it was really nice of them to do that," Schlegelmilch said.

In April 2007, the American Red Cross discarded 59 units of blood that were raised during a Greek Week blood drive after quality control assessments determined students might have given inaccurate medical histories in order to donate blood. Doubts over the blood were raised after volunteers of the American Red Cross became aware that the incentive program's rules had changed.

Schlegelmilch said it was important to have all incentive programs offered to all donors, whether they actually donated blood or if they even made an attempt.

"The whole thing with the Greek drive is that they were only offering the incentive to people who actually donated blood and not to all presenting donors and we did not know that until the blood drive was about over. By then it was kind of one of those things that they had to make a decision," Schlegelmilch said. "So, they went ahead and canceled it for that drive just to make sure everything was good to go and in the future that this kind of thing wouldn't happen again."

Schlegelmilch said while that specific drive did not go well, the Red Cross will continue to work with UNO and its organizations in the future.

"It's always better safe than sorry when you're dealing with the precious lives of all the patients here," Schlegelmilch said. "As far as I know, we'd love to work with the Greek organization again."

Public defender appointed in murder case

TAYLOR MULLER
NEWS EDITOR

The attorney for the Omaha man accused of murdering a pre-nursing student withdrew during a hearing Tuesday and was replaced by a public defender.

Douglas County Attorney Don Kleine said the public defender was appointed due to lack of funds to pay for the defense attorney, John Kohl.

Kyle Bormann, 19, was charged with first-degree murder and using a firearm to commit a felony. He was apprehended after driving through the crime scene where 21-year-old Brittany Williams was found dead.

Williams was shot in the head while sitting in the drive-through lane of Kentucky Fried Chicken/Long John Silver's restaurant at 7601 N. 30th St. on Jan. 21.

According to a police statement released on the incident,

Kyle Bormann

Bormann was seen running from his car and throwing a high-power rifle to the ground.

Police said that during an interview Bormann had admitted to shooting Williams.

Douglas County Attorney Don Kleine also filed notice of aggravating circumstance on Jan. 31, asserting that the shooting was racially motivated.

"If the jury finds [Bormann] guilty and if the aggravating circumstance exists, a three judge panel is called to decide between death penalty or life in prison," Kleine said.

Bormann has waived his preliminary hearing and will remain jailed without bail.

Kleine said the trial would be entering the discovery process. After the police investigation is concluded, all evidence and information would be passed on to the prosecution and defense attorneys.

Kleine also said that all pre-trial motions would also be filed at this point.

Legislative drug bill could criminalize hallucinogenic plant in Nebraska

EUGENE KIM
STAFF WRITER

Salvia divinorum, a psychotropic herb native to Mexico, remains legal in the majority of states, but Nebraska Attorney General Jon Bruning is looking to change that.

"There are nine states that have passed laws making it illegal. My goal is to make Nebraska the 10th," Bruning said.

Salvia has been widely available since the mid 90s primarily as a smoked herb that causes hallucinations and out of body experiences.

In recent years, it has received negative media attention, which alerted Bruning to the drug.

After seeing videos on YouTube of individuals under the influence of the drug, Bruning said "it became clear to [him] that there was a potential problem."

The bill, Legislative Bill 840, would list salvia in Schedule I Uniform Controlled Substance Act, on par with psychedelic mushrooms and LSD. Possession would constitute a Class IV Felony, with a penalty of up to five years, and distribution would be a Class III Felony, with imprisonment of up to 20 years.

According to the bill, the herb Salvia divinorum and the component Salvinorin A, along with all parts of the plant, including seeds, extracts, derivative, mixture or preparation of the plant would be illegal to possess or distribute.

The bill would not allow for salvia to be obtained for medical research, Bruning said.

"You might be able to find some pot-smoking scientist in California that thinks it's a good idea, but generally I would not say there are scientists that thinks this is a useful drug for research," Bruning said.

Wayne Briner, a professor of psychology at UNK, has done research of salvia on lab animals, and said he disagrees with Bruning.

"If you look at the national library of medicine, just in the last year alone, there has been somewhere on the order of 25 papers published on salvia and salvinorin A, and its effect on brain chemistry," Briner said. "In particular, it is used in either anesthesia or pain relief, which is showing a fair amount of promise.

"What makes salvia so interesting it has a very high margin of safety. I've given animals ... hundreds of times more drug than [it] would ever take to have a physiologic or psychological effect on humans, and the rats showed no indication of overdosing."

If LB 840 were passed, Briner would have to dispose of all the salvia in his possession and his research would come to a halt.

Marcia Adler, director of Student Health Services, said the media attention on the drug was only causing more problems.

"It's the junior high kids that are being impacted the most," Adler said. "They see from the news that the 'big kids' are doing it and want to try it out."

Briner said that salvia may warrant some controls, but shouldn't be illegalized in Nebraska.

"Perhaps, a better strategy that could be solved very easily would be simply by prohibiting the sale of salvia, period. That would dry up the Internet source of salvia, which is where 99 percent of this stuff is coming into Nebraska from," Briner said. "That's all they would have to do ... and it would pretty much go away."

If LB 840 passes, Bruning said he does not see a big change in the way law enforcement would work with salvia.

"It would just then be lumped in with other drugs that we enforce against, but I don't think there will be any special additional enforcement," he said.

administrative costs are across the board, but everyone has to account for them, and that's why it's figured into the allocation," Treadway said.

Joseph Huebner, director of UNO Finances, said the 3 percent charge is not applied to Fund B, which accounts for the bulk of student fees.

"Since Fund A is separate from university, where as Fund B is part of the university, those activities are covered by university general budget," Huebner said.

At the rest of the University of Nebraska, no other campus institutes an administrative cost on Fund A allocations.

However, others apply the cost to Fund B.

"Fund B is charged primarily, because those units are operated by full-time professional staff members, and so they are considered auxiliary departments in university, because they don't receive state funding," said Stan Campbell, associate vice chancellor for student affairs at UNL. "The vast majority of Fund A are funded through UPFF or self-generated income. So we look that there is a cost associated with providing those services for Fund B; so there should be appropriate compensation."

UNMC Associate Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs David Crouse said that none of Fund A was set aside for administrative costs and that all Fund A allocations were made through the university's student senate.

"Most of our students are professional students who don't need those organizations at UNO, UNL," Crouse said. "We don't distribute it to specific student organizations. They allocate it to student senate, and they decide who to fund."

UNK operates similarly as Lincoln, with no administrative charges to Fund A. The only extra on top of UPFF fees includes a weight room fee, which was voted on by the student body, said Tim Danube, the director of UNK's student center.

Online to-do lists provide options for organizing, procrastinating tasks

COMMENTARY BY SCOTT STEWART
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

I'm a to-do list junkie.

These brilliant tools combine two of my favorite aspects of managing projects: organization and procrastination. I simply can't get enough of them.

A good to-do list can be an incredible boost to your productivity, allowing you to perform triage and make sure the important things get done and the less-important things get squeezed in when possible.

To-do lists also provide incentive for people, like myself, that want the satisfaction of feeling one step closer to being done with a project (or the guilt of realizing you have only completed 4 of 53 tasks you wanted to get done).

Of course, for a shameless procrastinator like myself, perhaps the biggest appeal of to-do lists is it provides you with justifiable, meaningful use of time that actually avoids doing real work, at least until you've itemized everything you have to get done.

Like many people who use to-do lists, I've come to realize the advantages of using a Web-based product for keeping my lists. Online to-do lists provide easy access from anywhere and rarely leave an intrepid reporter/overwhelmed student without the ability to know exactly what he should be doing instead of watching Super Tuesday results.

There are many useful, free Web sites that offer to-do lists, and carefully examining each one would be a Herculean task. Here are some of my favorites, along with a couple other popular options and innovative alternatives.

Todoist.com

Todoist is currently my online to-do list of choice. It offers an easy interface and the bare-bone essentials for a list with an emphasis on due-dates. It also allows for structured lists, i.e. lists with sub-tasks, sub-sub-tasks and so on – even sub-projects are implemented, where entire clusters of tasks can be minimized with a single click.

Todoist also offers a flexible presentation by allowing you to search for tasks based on when they are due and what their priority is. For instance, my homepage displays only those tasks that are overdue or due today and tomorrow. Custom searches, such as for overdue and highest priority tasks, are easy to make with a search bar in the upper-left corner of the screen.

I would highly recommend this service to anyone looking to start an online to-do list.

Rating: 4 1/2 stars

TODOIST

Voo2Do.com

This clean to-do list Web site was my first real experience using an online to-do list. Before I stumbled across Voo2Do, I just used Microsoft Word documents for my list (which might not be such a bad idea if you're fond of using Google Documents or even keep a Word document up-to-date on UNO's myFolder service...).

The appeal of Voo2Do for me, besides the amusing name of the service, is the ease of associating tasks with projects. I also enjoyed the relative ease of sharing a copy of my list on a Web page that can link my friends to, which is a great way to show my Facebook friends why I've not been posting on their walls much the past week.

Another feature of Voo2Do that has its appeal is that you can keep track of an estimated time to complete each task as well as use its timer to track elapsed time working on the project. This is useful, for instance, for someone working in software development, which is what motivated the service's creator.

My major grievance with the Web site is that it bogs down when you add too many tasks. Using my syllabi at the beginning of the semester, I created a list of everything I needed to do for all my classes this semester and that effectively made Voo2Do useless.

If you have specialized needs (like a programmer) or only have a few tasks, I would highly recommend this service. Otherwise, stick with Todoist or another product.

Rating: 3 1/2 stars

Other Services

There are literally dozens of functional to-do list services online. Some of the more popular ones include Toodledo.com, Tadalist.com and Remember the Milk.

Toodledo offers a very extensive list of services, but I prefer Todoist because the interface for Toodledo is a little complex for a simple to-do list. That said, Toodledo's contexts and folders make categorizing tasks simple. The ability to repeat tasks also makes the service great for people who want to include recurring activities like exercising or calling home.

While Toodledo might be a little too complex, Tadalist is probably a little too simplistic for most people's needs. While it's a great service for keeping track of lists of books to read, a Christmas card mailing list or similar ideas, it's not that functional as a to-do list because it lacks due dates and priorities – two things that are a must for keeping organized. It's not a bad solution for someone who wants something very simple, though.

Rememberthemilk.com, provides a nice compromise between function and interface like Todoist. Milk also has built-in contexts for personal, study and work tasks, which is nice for most students making to-do lists. Still, when it comes down to it, Milk isn't quite as clean or easy to use as Todoist, although it's probably No. 2 in my book. It's certainly worth checking out if you're searching for a to-do list service.

Facebook.com Applications

Ever since Facebook decided to launch its application platform, many of us have flooded our profiles with everything from Super Walls and Causes to (fluff) Friends and quotes from our favorite historical or literary personalities. Why not make Facebook the home of your to-do list?

Well, the simple answer is that there are no incredible to-do lists that are native to Facebook. Looking in the application directory, "To Do List" is probably the best of the Facebook services, offering a simple table-style list on the right-hand portion of your profile, listing the task name, due date and priority. This isn't a bad tool if you want to keep your friends updated on the major projects in your life, but it's not something I would use.

From there, the applications go downhill. "So much to-do!" and "Mini Todo" both offer more compact to-do lists for the left column of your profile. "So much to-do!" displays lists with tasks as bullet points and might be good

Valentine's survival: Top 5 romantic movies for men

COMMENTARY BY
CONTRIBUTOR

Valentine's Day is right around the corner so, before your significant other forces you to watch "Love Actually" or "The Notebook," whip out this handy list of romantic movies that both of you can enjoy. I'm no Antoine Marryweather or Blaine Edwards, but I am going to give you this list of romantic movies from a male point of view.

"House of Flying Daggers" (2004)

The demise of China's Tang Dynasty in A.D. 859 sparked unrest throughout the country as the corrupt government is at war with rebel armies. This is the setting for "House of Flying Daggers," a supremely powerful movie that combines gravity-defying martial arts, swordplay, suspense, the most beautiful color palette and a powerful love story. The conflict between love and duty is captured perfectly between the gorgeous Mei (Ziyi Zhang) and the honorable Jin (Takeshi Kaneshiro). It has all the makings of an epic action movie but is truly a great love story presented through grand battle choreography and intense visual art.

"Ladyhawke" (1985)

"Ladyhawke" is a truly epic love story that illustrates the torment endured when two true lovers are unable to be together. An evil bishop (John Wood) has placed a curse on the great knight Capt. Etienne Navarre (Rutger Hauer) and his lover, Isabeau d'Anjou (Michelle Pfeiffer), because he lusts for Isabeau but cannot have her.

By night, Navarre becomes a wolf while Isabeau takes human form and by day, Isabeau becomes a hawk while Navarre takes human form. The two can never be together until the curse is lifted. Enter Phillippe Gaston (Matthew Broderick), a convicted thief who has escaped the dungeons of Aquila where the bishop is heavily guarded. Navarre enlists the help of an unwilling Gaston to show him a way into the fortress where he can slay the bishop and end the curse.

Broderick's hilarious banter, Hauer's swordplay and badassness and Pfeiffer's enchanting beauty make for an awesome romantic action film.

"Chasing Amy" (1997)

Kevin Smith's first movie to reach box-office success and third in the series of Smith's New Jersey-based films is about Holden McNeil (Ben Affleck) and Banky Edwards (Jason Lee), two comic book artists and best friends who are trying to make a name for themselves with "Bluntman and Chronic," a comic based on Jay (Jason Mewes) and Silent Bob (Kevin Smith). Holden meets the raspy-voiced Alyssa Jones (Joey Lauren Adams) and falls in love but is crushed when he finds out she is a lesbian.

Smith is lighter on the comedy and heavier on the romance and drama as he presents the rocky relationship between Holden and Alyssa. Alyssa has a very wild past and the naive Holden must cope with what he learns about her as he attempts to have a "normal" relationship with her. A great movie in the vein of "Clerks" and "Mallrats."

"The Princess Bride" (1987)

As Peter Falk says to the young Fred Savage in the opening of the film, the movie has "fencing, fighting, torture, revenge, giants, monsters, chases, escapes, true love, miracles..." What more could you ask for in a love story or any other movie for that matter?

"The Princess Bride" is as

epic a love story as they come with narration from Falk as he reads the story to his sick grandson. Westley (Cary Elwes), a farm boy that loves his employer, Buttercup (Robin Wright Penn), must leave for the seas. Westley becomes the Dread Pirate Roberts while Buttercup believes he has been killed. Numerous events unfold with great battles of the sword, of brute strength and of wits as Westley defeats the Men who abducted Buttercup.

Because of this movie, everyone knows the line: "My name is Inigo Montoya. You killed my father. Prepare to die." If you have not seen this movie, you have been deprived of one of the greatest works of art to ever grace the screen. Every actor in this movie stated that they have never had another role that was as great as their role in this film; roles that were filled by some of our dearly departed like Andre the Giant and Peter Cook. Words cannot express the significance of this movie. It is truly the greatest love story of all time.

"There's Something About Mary" (1998)

"There's Something About Mary" is probably the best Ben Stiller movie ever. The movie is so unapologetically humorous at the expense of the handicapped and animals that you cannot help but laugh until it hurts.

Ted Stroehmann (Stiller) is obsessed with Mary Jensen (Cameron Diaz) and cannot get her out of his head. He has not had a decent relationship since he lost her after an unfortunate event involving a zipper and getting his "beans above the frank" during prom night. He enlists the help of a private detective (Matt Dillon) to find Mary but unwittingly adds one more stalker to the list of men after Mary. Many genuinely funny moments and memorable movie quotes emerged from this film and will forever be the best romantic comedy ever.

Coheed and Cambria open tour with Linkin Park at Omaha's Qwest Center

ANDREA BARBE
ASST. FEATURES/A&L EDITOR

With the arrival of big name artists hitting Omaha this month, local music fans are sure to be pumped about the return of progressive rock band Coheed and Cambria on Feb. 12. The Qwest Center will host the quartet, which just finished headlining the "Kerrang!" tour in the U.K., with fellow rockers Chiodos and Linkin Park also on the ticket.

Just minutes before playing a sold-out show at Cardiff University, C & C guitarist Travis Stever spoke with the Gateway about their fourth album and their upcoming tour.

I'm going to start off with a question you guys probably get asked most often. How did you come up with your current band name? I know it's changed a few times since the band was originally formed.

We had a band name before that we were all very unhappy with. After doing small, mini tours, we got picked up by an established label called Equal Vision Records. We were never really happy with our name to begin with and other people in the industry voiced their opinion about us coming up with something that suited the band more.

Our music had changed and we wanted to be taken seriously. Claudio, our lead singer, had been working on stories about two characters named Coheed and Cambria and we all really liked that. So when we decided to take on the new name, we adopted the stories too and the whole saga that went along with it.

In Oct. 2007, you guys released your fourth album, "Good Apollo, I'm Buring Star IV, Volume Two: No World for Tomorrow." What's been the most difficult part about recording this album?

We went through a lot of band changes between our third and fourth albums. Our drummer and bass player had to leave.

I'm not going to speak for either one of them, because they both had their own things to do. Our bass player was in an existential crisis of sorts and dealt with different problems within the clichés of the music rock world. There were a lot of personal deep things that he was dealing with, not just your chemical dependency bullshit.

Coheed and Cambria's latest album, released in October, completed the four-disc tale of the band's namesakes.

Claudio and I were up shit's creek without a paddle, essentially. We lost two important people in what we were a huge part of. Claudio and I sat down together and ironed out some songs. Claudio started on keyboards. Chris Pennie joined us as our new drummer and became huge influence on writing process of album. He's such a great person to work with.

He's really driven in a way worked out perfect in the end. Mike, our bassist, was doing so well and wanted to play with us again. We tested it out and it worked for everyone. He helped put together his parts of the album and it all came together even better. He did a great job and this band is the way we'll stay. We're very happy.

All of Coheed & Cambria's albums have a science fiction concept. How have fans responded to that?

The Coheed & Cambria stories are based off of real life experiences - it's an actual story.

Real life experience tends to dictate what happens throughout the story. We've already gone through three albums, but we decided that on the last album, we didn't want to have that big long name on the CD. It seemed annoying to keep that. But big fans of ours are also big fans of the story. Now we're telling the prequel of Coheed and Cambria and we saw an opportunity to take it further.

It's become a huge part of this band. It [the story] doesn't need to be known to be a fan of this band. Lyrically, listeners can be connected just by a normal listening connection. I find that once people get really into the band, they'll want to follow the band, even though we don't necessarily push that.

What's it going to be like playing with Linkin Park, who has experienced as much success in past years as you have?

It's going to be exciting. We're really interested to see how things will work. They've been around just as long as we have and from what I've heard of their new stuff, I like. They have also experienced changing things up like we have. It will be interesting to be on this bill with three different bands.

Is there anything special or different on this tour in particular?

We try to get ourselves ready to put on a great show because that's what people are coming for. We have minimal amount of visual stuff on this tour. Normally, we tend to incorporate more on a tour, especially when we did our headlining tour. We like to have our audience have something to look at besides us. As far as what to expect, we give it our all. We do a good job. How can I possibly say that without sounding egotistic? We do our best and we hope our fans enjoy the shows.

Coheed & Cambria will be performing alongside Chiodos and Linkin Park at the Qwest Center on Feb. 12. Tickets are $47.50 for this 7 p.m. show. Alumnus big part of art community

ASST. FEATURES/A&L EDITOR

A massive nest of computer parts used to great patrons in the Criss Library's main lobby. On the way to class, students would walk by the aluminum cans lining the water fountain in the Weber Fine Arts Building. Driving home, one of the Omaha "O!" statues would capture the city's attention.

What many don't realize is that a recent UNO alumnus was behind each of those eye-catching creations.

Bart Vargas, one of Omaha's rising stars in the art community, was the creator of these sculptures that can be seen all over the metro area. Vargas graduated from UNO in May 2007 with a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree in Sculpture and has experienced lots of success in the past few months, including a win at the Omaha Entertainment and Arts Award in January for his work.

"It was a great honor to get that award," Vargas said. "When I went to the ceremony, I wasn't even expecting to win. I was just glad to be on the list, because there is a lot of talent here in Omaha."

Vargas' respect for the community and desire to be respected is likely a result of just how engrained his artwork was into the campus.

"As a student who just graduated, I try to be active in the community," Vargas said. "Sometimes with art, it's hard to get feedback on it. You make stuff and you see being displayed, but you're really not around to see how people interact with it or to see if it connects with them. So it was good to get positive feedback like that."

Last June, Vargas was selected to decorate a giant "O!" for the city's "O! Public Art Project" aimed at celebrating art, health and community spirit. His sculpture was the only one out of the 22 that was selected to travel to several different locations all over Omaha, making special appearances at Septemberfest, the Cox Classic Golf Tournament and even the College World Series.

"For my design, I painted 22 logos of that O! on it randomly; that was to represent the 22 O!'s around the city," Vargas said. "Then, I alternated red lines with five different colors of skin tones. I tried to think of what the city wanted to do with that program and I thought a great way to celebrate the city was through the cultural diversity. I used different colors to symbolize that."

Vargas now works at Anderson O'Brien Fine Arts Gallery in Countryside Village, but soon hopes to further his education. For the past several months, he has been working on graduate school applications with the ultimate goal of graduating with a Master of Fine Arts in Sculpture with the possibility for showing a list of goals rather than everyday tasks. "Mini Todo" has a private and public list, as does "ToDo List," but has a cluttered look, although you can check-off tasks directly from your profile.

Overall, unless you want to display a handful of tasks for your friends' benefit more than your own, you would be better off using a service not integrated with Facebook.

Twitter.com

I recently joined the many folks online who have discovered the addictive pleasure of twittering. Essentially a Web site devoted to the idea of a Facebook (or, ahem, MySpace, I guess) status message, Twitter allows its users to share their innermost thoughts immediately in 140 characters or less from online, via text messages or through instant messaging services.

An article on Lifehack.org, an amazing Web site for nerds, like myself, who are looking to make their life more productive and efficient, suggests using Twitter as a to-do list by enabling text message support and updating your status when you think of a new ask.

While a little more barebones than most people probably would want, using text messages to update Twitter with to-do items is a great way to keep track of easy-to-forget tasks (like what movie to rent or that you should return a call). If that's all your looking for in a to-do list, this is a good solution; otherwise, you're probably better off sticking with a full-fledged service like Todoist or Voo2do.

and types your note, delivering an e-mail to your inbox containing your note. Simply setting up a Jott account to e-mail reminders to a Gmail account is enough to setup a basic to-do list. Here's how:

1. If you don't have a Gmail account, visit gmail.com to set one up. If you already use Gmail, create a label called "todo" and setup a filter that labels e-mails from notify@jott.com as todo items.

2. Sign up for a Jott.com account, entering your (new) Gmail account and your phone number.

3. Call Jott at 1-877-568-8486 and tell Jott that your note is for "me." Then preface your to-do items with the word "remember," e.g. "Remember to finish reading Descartes' 'Meditations' before class."

That's it. You should then have an e-mail labeled "todo" in your inbox shortly with your item. Simply archive or delete the e-mail once you've completed the task, and you have a to-do list function accessible anywhere your cell phone works that's already integrated with your e-mail.

As an added bonus, you can tell Jott to send reminders and keep track of other notes by setting up folders. Pursue Jott's help section and videos for more information about these cool features.

If you're someone who just can't get enough of Information Technology Service's fine products, did you know that you can actually keep a to-do list on Blackboard? Sign in to your account at myuno.unomaha.edu using your NetID and password, then click on "Tasks" under the heading "Tools" in the leftmost column. Here you can create your own to-do list tracking the task name, description, due date, priority (low, normal, high) and status (not started, in process, complete).

About the biggest advantage of this service is that it's integrated into Blackboard, meaning that you can update it whenever you visit your courses' homepages there. It also saves the minute or so necessary to wait for a confirmation e-mail from another service. Is that enough to make it worth using? Absolutely not, but it's there if you want to anyway.

Pen and Paper

Online to-do lists aren't necessarily for everybody, and some people prefer to keep their lists using good, old fashioned pen and paper. In fact, self-titled "world's leading to-do-list-ologist" Sasha Cagen runs the To-Do List Blog, where she runs a "Save the To-Do List" campaign. She urges people in a Nov. 10 post to return to "the holy grail of list making" and save the handwritten to-do list from its fate in the annals of antiquity.

If you're interested in reading more, check out her blog at todolistblog.blogspot.com. Overall, though, I'm inclined to think saving the whales is a more worthy cause.

Easy-E, the Penguin and Mr. T

The characters that made Super Bowl XLII Oscar-worthy

Wow.

It's all I could muster through my Macaulay Culkin expression, and I repeated the word several times. Giants 17, Patriots 14. No last minute drive by Tom Brady, no questionable fourth down penalties to keep hope alive. New England had finally lost, and it was on the grandest stage in professional sports.

I eventually snapped out of it and began to comprehend what I had just watched. I, along with a Super Bowl record 97.5 million others, had just witnessed the gutsiest of performances, the most dramatic of conclusions and an underdog story worthy of the big-screen.

What makes it so? For starters, every good movie has a hero. Sometimes it's exactly who you'd expect, while in the best movies, the hero is someone you would've never seen coming. Cue Easy-E.

Admittedly, I was an Eli Manning naysayer to the very end. His "aw, shucks" attitude off the field matched with his mistake-littered play on the field had made him nothing more than a punch-line for much of his four year NFL career.

He was too soft. He had no composure. The New York media and fans were bound to chase him out of town. He was never going to escape his brother's shadow.

Then he guided his team to three playoff wins and a Super Bowl berth, without a single interception along the way.

Still, there was no way he could go up against the mighty Patriots, match throw for throw with Brady in the Super Bowl and, if needed, lead them on a game-winning drive in the game's final minutes with nearly 100 million people watching. No way in hell.

Then, the immaculate escape. In what will become known as one of the most famous plays in Super Bowl history, Eli spun 360 degrees, fought through the grasps of three New England defenders and fired a bullet 32 yards downfield to keep the game-winning drive alive. He would find Plaxico Burress in the end-zone just two plays later to all but clinch the Lombardi Trophy.

In that moment, Easy-E stepped out of his brother's shadow. He crawled out of the fans' doghouse.

He erased his name from his critics' notebooks and etched it into Super Bowl record books – the game's 42nd MVP.

"We just had total faith and confidence that no matter what is thrown at us, we can handle it and we can overcome it," said Eli after his heroic triumph.

Eli Manning, you've officially arrived.

Of course, where there's a hero, there has to be bad guys.

Even with Thomas Edward Brady as their quarterback, the Patriots were easy for fans to root against. Between illegal videotape charges, apparent score running in several regular season games, mockingly coy interactions with the press and an 18-0 record, the double-digit underdog Giants had a huge portion of Super Bowl XLII's viewers behind them.

On the team that is so easy for me to root against, there are two who are easy for me to hate.

If this were a movie, Laurence Tureaud, a.k.a. Mr. T, would be playing the role of New England strong safety Rodney Harrison. As a trash-talking, steroid-using cheap shot artist that is finally exposed in the film's final moments, it's Clubber Lang in "Rocky III" all over again.

I admit, he's made some clutch postseason interceptions, and he's a safety worth keeping an eye on when trying to catch a pass between the hashes. But far too often Harrison hits someone after the play is over, tries to initiate a fight or boasts to the heavens after making a run-of-the-mill tackle or deflection.

During the Giants' game-winning drive, David Tyree capitalized on Manning's Houdini act by snatching a 32-yard pass out of the air with Clubber, er, Rodney desperately hanging on his arm. As I said before, that is a play, a moment and potentially a photo that will forever live in Super Bowl lore.

If it's made into a poster, I'm buying two.

Harrison's on-the-field persona, however brash, seems almost lovable in comparison to the scoffing arrogance exuded by his head coach. The diva that is Bill Belichick exited to professional sport's grandest stage on Sunday with a classic classlessness only he could pull off.

With the game in hand but seconds still left on the clock, Belichick threw a tantrum. He stormed toward midfield for his typical post-game I'm-only-doing-this-because-it's-traditional-you're-not-actually-worthy-of-my-handshake handshake with Giants Head Coach Tom Coughlin.

Trying to restore order and finish the game was Mike Carey, the first black referee to head a Super Bowl. Belichick congratulated Carey for his groundbreaking achievement by shoving him aside like a loose piece of garbage.

Then, he proceeded to waddle into the locker room like the Penguin chasing Batman while several of his players lined up for the final snap and congratulated their counterparts.

Billy, I understand the disrespect you show to the media during interviews and press conferences. In your mind, they are clearly your inferiors; I get that. But how about showing some respect to your peers? In several games this season, you purposely piled-up points on teams during your mission to prove that your confirmed use of illegal cameras used to get an edge on the New York Jets in the season opener was inconsequential. Not once did a coach walk off the field like a Batman character during one of those games before the clock struck zero.

No, only you can manage to act above it all, even in defeat. Only you can hold onto the mind-set into your 50s that the world revolves around you. Only you have the audacity to end the Super Bowl before it's over.

I'm sure I've lost all Patriots fans by now, but in case I haven't, let us put our differences aside and agree on this: Sunday's game was spectacular from start to finish. Super Bowl XLII contained the action, suspense, drama and excitement that any moviegoer could appreciate. We can only hope for a sequel.

remains appreciative for his education and the exposure he has received.

"I'm really grateful to UNO and the programs that they offer out here at UNO that I not only learned from, but benefited from," Vargas said. "The UNO community and the art community have both been very good to me."

Vargas' sculptural art exhibit, "One Man's Trash" is now open at the Bemis Underground, located at 724 S. 12th St. The gallery is free to the public and can be viewed Wednesdays through Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m., through Feb. 24. For details, call 408-2397 or visit bemisunderground.org.

Mavericks versus Mavs: round two

JASON SIBSON
SPORTS EDITOR

It doesn't get any bigger than this.

The No. 1 Minnesota, Mankato Mavericks are hours away from filing into the Sapp Fieldhouse for a highly anticipated rematch. Waiting behind the Sapp's doors will be the No. 2 UNO Mavericks, healthy as they have been since November and starved for redemption.

Regulation wasn't enough to decide the last dual between these two programs, which was held in Cedar Falls, Iowa, on Jan. 13. Minnesota State heavyweight Brady Wilson registered a takedown over Tony Lewis in the closing seconds of sudden death overtime to bag the upset over the perennial giants of Division II wrestling.

The win gave MSU the National Wrestling Coaches Association National Duals Title, a crown that was captured by UNO two out of the last three years.

Without No. 1 Cody Garcia or senior captain Henry Wahle in action, UNO lost four of its first five bouts in that match. A valiant comeback fell short and left the losing Mavericks grappling for answers.

UNO fought through adversity, namely injuries, to split in Minnesota-held duals later in the month.

Then, the Mavericks got healthy and made a resounding statement.

Last weekend, UNO trampled over No. 3 Central Oklahoma-the defending national champions-and No. 4 UNK in back-to-back nights. The Top 4 is slowly sorting itself out and so far, UNO is doing the sorting.

Garcia and Wahle will both be in the lineup for this Friday's one versus two showdown, and a hungry and confident group of Maverick wrestlers have purple and gold on their minds.

"They are going to see a different team," said sophomore Jacob Marrs, Division II's No. 2 wrestler at 197 pounds. "We'll have Garcia in the lineup, and we feel like every guy has gotten better since the national duals."

Wrestling fans can enjoy the meet live on NET or see it happen in person at the Lee and Helene Sapp Fieldhouse. The first bout is set for 7 p.m., and tickets are free to all UNO students.
